You might think Zed is a light-skinned black guy. In fact he's from a future world in which race, ethnicity and the attendant conflicts have been eliminated. He's time-traveled back to our post-9/11 world to blend in with the "contemps" and execute his mission. Zed's job is to stop other time travelers ("hags," or historical agitators) from revising history.

What The Revisionists really offers, at its heart, is a chance to see our crazy, mixed-up world at arm's length. The observation is often keen, even razor-sharp, and author Thomas Mullen "whose previous books have been historical novels" manages the deft trick of the insider writing as an outsider without sounding smug or disingenuous, or falling into any of the other traps that have snagged lesser observers of human nature.

It is a positive thrill to be able to review a book as interesting and profound as Mr. Mullen's The Revisionists. Time travel, or its near facsimile must be this season's zeitgeist, because both The Revisionists and The Map of Time have it as a central core. For long-time fans of science fiction, Mr. Mullen doesn't really pull out any new stops in his story as far as the SF elements go.
